Edison and Music

By Victor Young

(Special Note: Victor Young was for several years connected with the Edison Industries at West Orange, New Jersey, and part of his time he saw Mr. Edison's personal papers and worked directly in the making of phonograph records.)

Thomas Edison with his daughter, Miss Edison, and a young woman, Miss Edison, at West Orange, New Jersey.

INDIVIDUALS believe that the greatest discovery of the 19th century was the electric light. It was not, however, the electric light that changed the world, but the phonograph. It was the phonograph that made it possible for the first time to preserve the human voice and to reproduce it at will. It was the phonograph that made it possible for the first time to have a permanent record of a performance, and to have it reproduced at will. It was the phonograph that made it possible for the first time to have a permanent record of a performance, and to have it reproduced at will.

During a recording session one night, we had a short conversation with the inventor. He was sitting at his desk, and we were standing in front of him. He was looking at us with a friendly expression, and we were looking at him with interest. He was talking to us about his work, and we were listening to him with attention. He was talking to us about his work, and we were listening to him with attention.

To Give Untaught Chorus-Singers Some Idea of Reading Music

By EDWIN HALL PIERCE

THE IDEAL of one or two on which all members should strive may be made more readily practicable among the average choir when following up the progress of study and organized musical instruction. Each choir runs its own race for the best and best results are obtained when the choir is organized on a high standard of musical culture. This has been shown by the success of the best choirs.

The remainder who have good voices and fairly good musical training should be able to do more than to sing simple parts written for the leader or the organist. It is better to have a few who can do more than to sing simple parts written for the leader or the organist.

The more prepared members of the choir, for the leader's work should be done in a choir, and the more prepared members of the choir, for the leader's work should be done in a choir, and the more prepared members of the choir, for the leader's work should be done in a choir.
